

views

#escleancityviews

MPs should help combat filthy air

YOUR excellent article, "Ministers must clean up air quality in their backyards", May 9, might well include many others not named in your paper. Defence Secretary Michael Fallon will spring to mind for some of your readers commuting back to Sevenoaks, which is his constituency.

People have been banging on his door for a decade to try to get help with solving the local traffic nightmare and introducing air quality management areas, but he has done little about either.

Perhaps, in order to gain their support, he could pledge to reinstate the long overdue missing east-facing slip roads in the vicinity of junction five of the M25 by Sevenoaks, which undoubtedly would improve air quality in one part of Kent.

Tim Shaw

I LIVE in Putney, a constituency represented by Education Secretary Justine Greening, an area highlighted as having "blackspots of filthy air". These concerns were an issue two

d by ters. After
eir union
h on the

rt Readman

ernments
th and
r ageing
this current
aging, then,
o be high up
e election.

ance of
aking it
uld more
isting
y new s words
me we
word "crisis"
r country's